

Abstract

People tend to get political information from the media that shares their ideology and is controlled by co-partisan elites. Does this lead to worse collective decisions than the case in which everyone uses all the media sources? To answer this question, I build a game-theoretic model that involves signaling and collective choice. The model shows that the latter situation is only better if political elites have close preferences; otherwise, the former scenario is better.